

r/AskAnAmerican • 2y ago
Aggressive_Tart_3137

What's university accommodation like in the US???

EDUCATION

I'm from the UK and especially curious as I might be doing an international study year in my third year. I've seen on TV shows and in Movies people having roommates in the literal sense of the word like two people share each room I'm curious how common that is because that's not really a thing here. Here the usual set up is either a big tall building or in my case a student village, a gated area of smaller buildings near campus, made up of flats each flat having a kitchen and 5-6 bedrooms maybe en suites or maybe shared bathroom depending what you paid for. Wondering if it's similar.

Archived post. New comments cannot be posted and votes cannot be cast.

22 93

CutCloudCosts • Promoted

Hey Reddit, Can we talk about cloud costs? Have you given up on spot instances because AWS pricing barely beats 3-year RIs? Rackspace Spot takes a different approach: true market auctions for unused server capacity. Bid for servers with 16 vCPUs, 120 GB of RAM from $0.001/hr. Save >90% vs AWS.

| CONTROL PLANE     |                        | WORKER NODES           |                        |
|-------------------|------------------------|------------------------|------------------------|
| Ready             |                        | Ready                  |                        |
| Desired Nodes     | 1                      | 1                      | 1                      |
| Provisioned Nodes | 1                      | 1                      | 1                      |
| Type              | Spot                   | General Purpose        | General Purpose        |
| Server Class      | General Purpose        | General Purpose        | General Purpose        |
| Max Bid Price     | $0.001                | Disabled               | 7% days                |
| Autoscaling       | Disabled               | 7% days                | Custom.com/autoscaling |
| Age               | 7% days                | Custom.com/autoscaling | Custom.com/autoscaling |
| Labels            | Custom.com/autoscaling | Custom.com/autoscaling | Custom.com/autoscaling |

| Type | Cost         | Version | Age     | CPU Usage %             | Memory Usage %    | Server Pool                          |
|------|--------------|---------|---------|-------------------------|-------------------|--------------------------------------|
| Spot | $0.001 / hr | v1.28.6 | 10 days | 9.9% (0.102/1.02 cores) | 43.8% (1.75/4 GB) | cx121878-acdc-408ba-aw3-67c18ba77f50 |
| Spot | $0.001 / hr | v1.28.6 | 1 day   | 4.9% (0.051/1.02 cores) | 36.3% (1.45/4 GB) | cx121878-acdc-408ba-aw3-67c18ba77f50 |

Sign Up

spot.rackspace.com

Sort by: Best ▼ Search Comments

bearsnchairs • 2y ago
California Top 1% Commenter

Sharing a room is generally the default at American university housing, but there are thousands of schools here so your particular experience may vary.

TheBimpo • 2y ago
Michigan Top 1% Commenter

Sharing a bedroom is the default. Single rooms are becoming more common, but they are typically more expensive.

Older buildings may have communal bathrooms. More modern ones are set up closer to an apartment, minus the kitchen.

It's very common for upperclassmen to live in off-campus housing so they have more freedom and independence.

DOMSdeluise • 2y ago

Texas=>Georgia  Top 1% Commenter

Sharing a room is very common and the vast majority of on campus housing is going to be like that. A lot of students live in off campus accommodations as well, particularly after their freshman or sophomore years.

[deleted] • 2y ago

Sharing a room is the default.

My first two years we had two bedrooms with two guys and shared a living room with a couch and TV.

My third year was two guys in a bedroom but we had no living room (bedroom was huge though).

Fourth year I had a single bedroom to myself.

cthulhu_on_my_lawn • 2y ago

It's pretty common to share a room, especially for freshmen. My university had some nicer on campus housing that was reserved for juniors and seniors (knowing they'd likely go off campus otherwise).

The nicest were like four bedroom townhouses where you would get your own bedroom and share bathroom, kitchen and living area with 3 other students.

eyetracker • 2y ago

Nevada  Top 1% Commenter

Many schools insist you live on campus the first year or two, but if you're coming third year you might have more flexibility and can choose. The first step is to see what the school has available as well, and then compare to private off-campus/near campus housing.

Aggressive_Tart_3137 OP • 2y ago

international placement students (obviously international students actually enrolled specifically there who have properly moved are different)

TheyMakeMeWearPants • 2y ago

New York

There's generally two options for housing:

- university provided housing, which is very frequently required for 1st year students, and decreasingly likely to be required for each later year
- do your own thing, where you find an apartment nearby and rent it on your own terms. Often a popular option for older students.

If you're doing this as some kind of prepackaged study abroad type of program, then none of us are going to tell you how your program works.

zugabdu • 2y ago

Minnesota

If you're in your third year, you probably won't be expected to be in a shared dorm room. You'll probably live in off campus housing and have your own room.

Ganymede25 • 2y ago

As someone from the UK, you may not be viewed as much as an international student compared to someone from say China or Egypt by the administration or the students once they get to know you.

Also, in the U.S., we use the term College instead of Uni.

Abi1i • 2y ago

Austin, Texas

Not quite. The general public will treat university and college as the same thing and switch between both words. In reality though, usually a university is made up of colleges. Though not all universities are called universities and not all universities are made up of smaller colleges. The term used in the U.S., as always will depend on a variety of factors.

AdministrativeTip479 • 2y ago

Michigan

Well, yes, but nobody says, "I'm going off to university." They say college.

SnowblindAlbino • 2y ago

United States of America

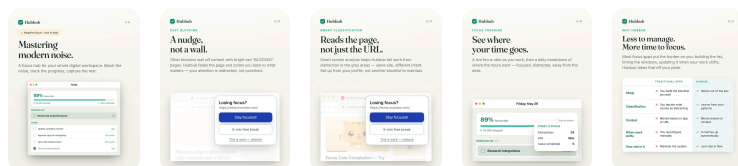

(source: professor at a university with 35 years of experience)

u/soarling1 • Promoted

Drowning in distractions and endless tasks?

hubbub.77sparx.com

Sign Up

wwhsd • 2y ago
California

If you are living in dorms most of the ones I've seen don't have individual kitchens and have communal bathrooms that are shared by everyone in that section of the dorm. Depending on the size of the dorm it might be one or two bathrooms per floor.

The dorm my kid was in had two very small rooms with bunkbeds that each connected to a slightly larger room that had 4 desks in it. People could pay extra to have one of the room with the beds to themselves but most people didn't.

The dorm I lived in had bigger rooms that were shared by two people, but there was no separate living or study area.

In both cases the dorms had common areas with couches, comfortable chairs, and TVs. Some people spent a lot of time in their own rooms but it felt like most people spent a lot of time hanging out and socializing in common areas.

sjedinjenoStanje • 2y ago
California

As usual, it depends.

At my college:

- freshman year: shared a room (bunk beds + sink) with one other guy. The showers and toilets were shared along the hallway of about 30 students. The whole dorm had ~120 students (two wings and two floors).

- sophomore: shared a suite with another guy. I luckily got the inner room. No sink, separate bedrooms, shared shower/toilet for the gender/hallway (so shared among about 12 students). About 50 students in that dorm (4 floors)

- senior: lived in a "co-op" that was basically a house, a mixture of singles, doubles and one quint (5 students). We shared cleaning and cooking duties in exchange for lower costs.

Aperson3334 • 2y ago

CO -> WLS -> CO

I did the opposite of you - studied in the US (Colorado State University) with an exchange program in the UK (Swansea Uni). Here is a photo album of all of the places I lived while in university, both in the US and the UK: <https://imgur.com/a/59o0ETH>

Photos 1-2 are somewhat typical of a dorm room. If you can avoid living here as an exchange student, I would. Most universities require first-year students to live here, and few returning students will live here. This was one of the newest dorm buildings on campus, and the room was 50% larger than those in other buildings. It also had a computer lab attached and was across a court yard from a large dining hall with many restaurants. This building had one bathroom per room, while the older rooms had shared bathrooms (toilets and showers) for each floor.

Photos 3-6 are where I lived for my second year and the first half of my third year. This was within the campus, but considered an apartment building instead of a dorm building. These are much less common than dorms, but becoming more common. These were not open to first-year students, but were where most exchange students chose to live. I lived in a four-bed/two-bath apartment shared with three other students assigned at random, but this building had three-bed, two-bed, one-bed, and studio configurations as well.

Photos 7-10 are where I lived during the half year exchange program to Wales. This was a ten-bed/ten-bath flat, which I'm led to believe is rather typical of UK accommodations, but I'm also led to believe that these rooms were a bit larger than typical (which lines up with what I saw at the main Swansea Uni campus). This kitchen was never remotely as clean as the photo in this album, being shared among ten students, nine of which were first-year.

Photos 11-14 are where I lived after returning from Wales. This was an apartment building that would only rent to students, but was about a five-minute walk away from the campus. Somehow I have no photos of the kitchen?! I moved here for their better roommate matching and cheaper rent, but the amenities were also much better. My building had a theater room, swimming pool, beach volleyball court, and dog park; the second building had a gym, sandwich shop, and coffee shop. This is most typical of where students will live after their first year.

An_Awesome_Name • 2y ago

Massachusetts/NH

Sharing a room is the standard for at least the first year at most universities. After that it really depends on what the university has.

Some have on-campus apartments with separate bedrooms, en suite bathrooms etc

Some have a pair of rooms that share a bathroom.

MittlerPfalz • 2y ago

Sharing a room is normal, especially among freshmen and sophomores (first and second year students). Usually there's a communal bathroom and common area.

But it should be easy enough to google the living arrangements of the school you're going to.

Advanced-Power991 • 2y ago dorms are set up so that having a roommate is common, usually they are assigned and you don't get to pick. that being said it is not uncommon to see them set up such that there is one kitchen for multiple rooms and shared bathrooms and bathing facilities <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=SPIMq8xyEY0>

[deleted] • 2y ago

Double occupancy is the norm, although at some older universities 3 and even 4 to a room is a thing; single rooms are not common but they do exist. Traditionally bathrooms were communal, with each floor of a dorm having 1-2 large bathrooms with multiple toilets and showers; this is why dorm buildings (or at least individual floors within a building) were traditionally restricted to a single sex. There usually are no kitchen facilities; meals are obtained from the dining hall either as a fixed-price "buffet style" or a la carte depending on the university with some offering both options.

Newer construction departs more from this. When I was in university 15ish years ago I lived in a newer building and our setup involved 2 bedroom "suites" with 2 people in each bedroom (4 people per suite). Each suite had a bathroom of its own so you only had to share it with 3 other people, but the downside was that you had to clean your own bathroom. Buildings and floors in this case were not sex-segregated but each suite was, so if you're a guy you would have 3 other guys as roommates (or "suitemates") but you could be next-door to a suite with 4 girls.

Accomplished_Mix7827 • 2y ago

Kansas

The way my dorm was set up in college is two people to a room, with each room having a bunk bed, two desks, and two dressers. Two of these rooms (so four people total) shared a small living room, a bathroom, and a small kitchenette (basically, enough to have some snacks in your dorm, not enough to cook proper meals). A few of these suites shared a study room and lounge, the building overall shared a laundromat in the basement, and several dorm buildings shared a central courtyard and a cafeteria where students took most of their meals. I believe this setup is fairly typical.

bedroom apartment with two roommates a couple miles out from campus, at one of the cheap apartment complexes that primarily catered to students.

[deleted] • 2y ago

I spent a semester at UCL, my dorm was right by Euston station. Sorry to say if you live on campus you are not going to get anything that nice. On the flip side, people kept breaking into the kitchen, ripping off the pantry doors and stealing our food. They would also take our eggs to egg our kitchen. That doesn't really happen here. You win some. You lose some.

cdb03b • 2y ago

Texas

2-4 sharing a room is the default depending on the school and room size. You can get special accommodations due to medical need, but just not like roommates does not suffice.

u/Budget-Sale712 • Promoted

...

Perfume Experience in Vietnam - Craft Bespoke Scent and Bottle Your Vietnam Memories

workshop.thescentnote.com

Book Now

BrooklynNotNY • 2y ago

Georgia

The double occupancy per bedroom is pretty standard but some schools do have other set ups. My freshman year I was assigned a 4 person, 2 room apartment but ended up switching with a friend of my roommate who was assigned a 3 person, 3 room apartment. So I ended up with my own room.

Odd-Help-4293 • 2y ago

Maryland

If you live on campus (many students live at home), sharing a room is the norm.

From what I've seen, usually you'll have typically 2-3 students per room, and 15-20 students will share a "hall" (a floor or wing of the dorm building). The hall will have shared bathrooms and showers, possibly a

Gunther482 • 2y ago • Edited 2y ago

Iowa

My university had both traditional two person dorm rooms and en suite "apartment" style for on campus housing.

The traditional dorm room was the shared one room dorm with two people in it with a shared bathroom for everyone on half the floor because the dorm room was divided in half by sections. There were four floors in each building with one half of the floor being boys and the other half being girls. Usually these students went to the dining hall to eat though each room had a small refrigerator and we could bring a microwave but the actual dining hall was in a separate building. These were the types of rooms most freshman were placed into.

The newer dorms did have en suite rooms where typically there were four separate bedrooms with a shared kitchen, living room area and bathroom. These were typically more expensive and the upperclassmen had first chance to live in these rooms.

I moved off campus my sophomore year and lived in a house off campus with roommates after freshman year, though.

anneofgraygardens • 2y ago

Northern California 🇺🇸 Top 1% Commenter

it depends so much. my freshman year I had a roommate but there were single rooms in my dorm for people who didn't want a roommate (this cost more).

My sophomore year i lived in on campus apartments. I had three housemates in the apartment but my own bedroom. At least at my university, if you wanted your own bedroom, it wasn't really difficult to get, although it might cost a bit more than a shared room.

(My junior year i did abroad, and shared a room in a dorm. Sharing is not only done in the US! Senior year i lived off campus.)

[deleted] • 2y ago

Many have shared rooms, you can have rooms with 2-4 people living in them. Shared bathrooms, not often on campus housing have kitchens, if they do it's shared. You can get a single bedroom but they tend to be more expensive and rarer. Oftentimes single bedrooms are given to students with disabilities first then raffled off in a lottery.

You can get suites. Suites typically have double or single bedrooms and shared bathrooms and communal areas, not always a kitchen.

Parking is not included, and is typically completely separate from dorms. Campuses will often have busses that travel between major points on campus. Sometimes scheduled times to grocery stores or a local Target/Walmart.

Jen_the_Green • 2y ago

I went to university in a major US city. Very few people lived on campus. There weren't nearly enough dorms and it was way more expensive to live on campus than just get an apartment with a few roommates. You can definitely look into renting a room in an apartment near whatever school you're going to, particularly if it's not in a rural area.

Floater439 • 2y ago

It varies widely...there are still traditional dorms where two people share a large room and a bath or use a communal bath down the hall. But these are being replaced at many schools by new buildings where each student has a private bedroom and maybe bath, then shares communal spaces like kitchenette and small living space with other students. Accommodations might be set aside specifically for groups like honors students, quiet dorms, graduate students, etc. There's even a church based off campus housing complex at a university near me.

glendacc37 • 2y ago

I worked 22 years at a major university. They had a little of everything--one room with 3 or 4 students to single rooms and everything in between, even apartment-like buildings. Bigger picture, it depends on your budget. Obviously, a single room is going to be significantly more expensive than a shared room.

houndsoflu • 2y ago

You share a room with a person. And bathroom with the floor. The room isn't big.

LadyGreyIcedTea • 2y ago

Massachusetts

Shared a bedroom with at least 1 roommate all 4 years of college. Freshman year was 3 of us in a room meant for 2 (forced triple).

GingerMarquis • 2y ago university. He had a mattress that reminded me of a mental asylum and a communal bathroom that smelled like just a little more bleach than fungus.

Real-Psychology-4261 • 2y ago

Minnesota

Sharing a dorm room is pretty much the default for college students in their 1st and 2nd years. After that, many of them get apartments or rent a house with several others.

Poi-s-en • 2y ago

Florida

You have options. The standard is usually a dorm room where you share a room, or a dorm that has one joint living quarters with separate bedrooms for each person. I've also been in student housing that are just condos, or a student village that is a bunch of townhouses.

chococrou • 2y ago

Kentucky —> 🇯🇵Japan

My university had two styles.

The first was the traditional US style dorm (two people sharing a very small room, each with their own bed) and shared showers and toilets on each floor.

The second was off campus, but campus owned, apartments where each person had their own room and shared a kitchen and shower only with their roommates in the same apartment. It was four bedrooms to each apartment. These were like three times the price of the normal dorms.

I didn't live in either since it was significantly cheaper to live off campus. Living on campus required us to enroll in mandatory food plans and insurances that made the cost astronomical.

LoudCrickets72 • 2y ago

St. Louis, MO

It's quite common for students to share a room (no more than 2). That was the case at my dormitory, at the University of Missouri (Mizzou). Even international students shared rooms with either domestic or other international students, but it was more common for them to share a room with an American.

There are other housing options open though.

[deleted] • 2y ago

If you're coming in for third year most likely you can find something not shared. But again you'll have to ask the school itself how they handle it.

b-sharp-minor • 2y ago

I'd say it depends on where the school is. In NYC, say, I would assume that you would be sharing a room unless you rent your own apartment somewhere. In a more rural area, a town where the university dominates, there will be a mix of housing. In the first two years, students are in dorms. After that, they move to a townhouse type place where everyone has their own room or they live off campus in a shared house, where everyone has their own room.

lorazepamproblems • 2y ago

DoublePostedBroski • 2y ago

It really depends on the school.

Newer dorms have a setup like you described where there are 3-4 individual rooms that share a common area. But older ones you typically share with another person.

[deleted] • 2y ago

In a dorm room, sharing a room is extremely common. One year, I was lucky and my roommate dropped out the first month and they never had anyone else move into that room with me so I was alone the whole semester.

Some universities also have apartment-style housing which is exactly like a flat; shared kitchen and living room, individual bedrooms.

68OldsF85 • 2y ago

YMMV, but this is what I consider a standard college dorm.

<https://youtu.be/yw535hmqNh4>

ChiSchatze • 2y ago
Chicago, IL

have living room stuff. If you're in a major city, you may have to go with university housing because of housing shortages or expenses.

shandelatore • 2y ago

Illinois

I live in a university town, and accommodations run the gamut. It depends on your finances and what's available on campus. Do you have a state or uni picked out?

Amperage21 • 2y ago

Texas

Depends. Dorms are like what you describe, but there are other students' housing options. When I went to Arizona State, I stayed in student housing on a satellite campus, and it was literally a 3 bedroom 1 bathroom house with a kitchen and living room and washer and dryer. Had two roommates sharing the house. The houses were old military housing back in the day.

SnowblindAlbino • 2y ago

United States of America

One of my kids spent a semester in London and had the sort of space OP wrote about: private room with its own bathroom, then a shared kitchen down the hall, on like the 7th floor of a 15-story building. It was tiny but private. I work at a university and we have exactly zero housing of that sort.

What we have is basically shared doubles for first year students (a bed on each side of the room, with a common bath down the hall). For sophomore/junior students there are better options, including suites where 4-6 students share common space and bathrooms, but usually (though not always) have private bedrooms.

For seniors we have mostly townhouses, which are usually four private bedrooms upstairs, and kitchen/living/bathroom on the main floor.

Many US schools have housing for only their younger students though, so lots of older students live off campus in apartments or rented houses. Personally, I had a dozen different roommates in as many different rooms during college/grad school...did not have a "private" personal room to myself until after college (though I chose to share a room for a while in there).

hoosiertailgate22 • 2y ago

If you're in your third year you're most likely gonna get your own room in off campus apartment. A lot of schools require freshmen to live on campus and are facing shortages where students are being crammed in rooms. Purdue is currently facing this issue.

Generally the standard is a shared room with one or more roommates. The most I have seen is 4 roommates sharing a larger room. There are often single person rooms on each floor of the dorm but they cost more and are less common.

SnooChipmunks2079 • 2y ago

Illinois

There's a ton of variation. "Two people in a bedroom" was the default construction for many decades, though, so it's very common in the US because colleges don't replace student housing very often.

I went to University of Illinois Urbana Champaign, graduating in the early 90's. I think every or nearly every university-owned dorm was "shared bathroom down the hall, two people to a room."

At least at UIUC, university owned student housing was not the only option, and some of the privately owned "dorms" were more like what you're describing.

trhs • 2y ago

There is a lot of variety in how college students live in America. Every university and college is different and most of them offer different types of living options.

Some have dorms with two or more people per room and large shared bathrooms. Some have suites with individual bedrooms, shared living room, kitchen and bathroom. Some students live in fraternity or sorority houses. Some people get roommates and share apartments off campus.

My best friend and I shared a very tiny one bedroom dorm that was like an apartment. Then, we moved to an off campus apartment with another roommate so we could have more freedom.

Pale_Draft9955 • 2y ago

Wisconsin

The tech college I briefly attended had an apartment complex off-site, but a short walk from the campus. One apartment would house 4 students. My guess is that they would split the rent bill among themselves since I didn't attend long enough to really consider living there.

Grenboom • 2y ago

Pennsylvania

In the US, the typical housing setup is that there's a bedroom in which 2 people share. Outside of that, there's typically a common room that tends to have a stove, a sink (never seen an oven in one though), a small table, and a cheap couch. There are typically gender specific bathrooms on each floor (only ever been in co-ed dorms before you ask) which has a few showers in it.

Most first year students will share a room and then there is usually a hall bathroom. Some newer ones will have single or double rooms around a common space and a bathroom as part of a larger hall. It's a big part of the "college experience" to have a roommate and live in a dorm. There may be a kitchen in the building but students eat in the dining hall generally. If you are an older student (like typically when studying abroad it's 3rd year) it's more likely apartments if on campus or else an off campus apartment. I haven't seen private university accommodation like I noticed in the UK

[deleted] • 2y ago

Depends. The university I went to ranged from glorified closets they crammed two people into up to reasonable spacious 2 bedroom apartments. A few dorms had individual bathrooms but most had a communal.

[deleted] • 2y ago

Two people sharing a room is very very common, actually it's rare not to have this in a dorm, but it's also common to have a dividing wall in the middle of the room so you have more privacy. It's not like you're on bunk beds and you have to battle your roommate over who's got the bottom bunk.

LaFleurRouler • 2y ago

Rhody 🇺🇸 & NOLA 🇺🇸

Ugh, so many places try to fit not just 2 people in one bedroom, but 4. The whole floor shares a common room and a bathroom. This usually is just freshman year/first year. Then it usually progresses to suites, each student gets their own bedroom and has to share a common room and bathroom with the whole suite. The amount of bedrooms in a suite vary, usually between 4-8, depending on the size of the university/college.

Aggressive_Tart_3137 OP • 2y ago

4?! Per room?! Nah I couldn't 🤔

An_Awesome_Name • 2y ago

Massachusetts/NH

I lived in a room with 4 of us my freshman year. It wasn't too bad since the room was more than twice the size of a typical double room.

We set up all the beds against the walls, and then had room for a small couch and TV in the middle.

Aggressive_Tart_3137 OP • 2y ago

An_Awesome_Name • 2y ago

Massachusetts/NH

Contrary to popular belief, university in the US isn't parties 24/7.

You only really see parties like the movies and people going on Fridays and Saturdays. Even then, most bars close at 2 AM here.

You can't be coming back from parties at 4 AM on a weekday and expect to stay a good enough student in most universities here. Even the big famous "party" state schools.

Aggressive_Tart_3137 OP • 2y ago • Edited 2y ago

Ah, Here a significant portion of the nights out are on weekdays because most students work or go home on weekends. Figured that was universal.

I live in a student heavy city and there are Nightclubs who do ticketed events on Monday-Thursdays every week targeted at students and that's when everyone goes. In my student village Monday nights especially it's just a sea of taxis going in and out lol and usually one of the flats becomes the spot everyone goes for afters

An_Awesome_Name • 2y ago

Massachusetts/NH

Yeah that's not the case here at all.

People don't go home the weekends generally because it's too far and/or there's sports events to go to. Most of the partying is centered around said sports events anyway. Either tailgating if it's a home event, or a watch party if it's on the road.

During the week you will have some degenerates that party non-stop, but for the vast majority of students, that is school time.

Aggressive_Tart_3137 OP • 2y ago

What about days you don't have classes? Like if you don't have classes or lectures on a Tuesday would you not be open to going out Monday night? That's still a responsible student?

Suppose maybe everyone's more considerate considering they share their room if their roommates not heading out, I probably would be.

An_Awesome_Name • 2y ago

Massachusetts/NH

had classes or labs every day.

waltzthrees • 2y ago

It's not that common to have a day without classes. I never did in my whole four years. It was mythical that someone could go a day without a class!

More replies

VeronicaMarsupial • 2y ago

Oregon

I never had a weekday without classes. Even if someone did, the chances that other people would have the same day off and want to party all night with them would be pretty slim.

If you have a big chunk of time off on a weekday, you do your reading and homework, relax, work at a part-time job, and/or enjoy some recreation. Not that you can't have a few drinks here and there or whatever, but most people would think you have a problem if you're getting trashed on weeknights with any frequency.

LaFleurRouler • 2y ago

Rhody 🇺🇸 & NOLA 🇺🇸

Honestly, it depends on where you go. Some schools have party school reputations. My university did. People went out all the time, but the Greek Life people were out of control.

I ended up transferring to another college in my state, wayyyy different culture. No one really went out, except weekends. And all partying was done off campus.

Gallahadion • 2y ago

Ohio

While some students will try to schedule their classes so that they don't have any on some days (Friday being a common one), it's not always easy to do so. In my six years of post-secondary education (4 undergraduate and 2 graduate), there was only one semester when I had days without a single class, and that was my second-to-last semester ever. And even then, that was because I was taking a slightly lighter class load.

SnowblindAlbino • 2y ago

United States of America

...creators, is that students should have two hours of homework for every hour spent in class. In practice that varies a lot, by major and by school, but realistically all of our students who are passing are putting in hours every day preparing for the next day's classes. Class is not just sitting and listening to lectures; most are discussion-based and you'll be embarrassed if you show up hungover and unprepared.

I've had dozens of students study abroad in London and most were shocked at how little effort their UK-based peers seemed to put into their classes. Most American students will have classes five days a week as well; the course schedules are not designed to make the whole "free day" thing very possible.

TokyoDrifblim • 2y ago

SC -> KY -> GA

Yeah most of us live at least 2 hours drive from our homes, if not a 10 hour plane ride. People go home from college once for the summer and once for winter break, and then we get a 4 day weekend for fall break and for spring break people usually use to go home if they're driving distance. I knew a lot of folks in college that didn't see their family except for christmas break because it's a $400 plane ride across the country to get to them. Especially freshman year tho, there's a parents weekend and most parents will come visit their kids

ToastMate2000 • 2y ago

$400 would have been about as cheap a ticket as I could get to go home from college for break, and that was 30 years ago. It took me at least a full day of travel and 3 flights each way.

Even the people I went to school with whose families were only an hour or so drive away didn't go home for the weekend more than once or twice per semester. Half the point of being in college was to take advantage of all the extracurricular things to do with the other students.

SnowblindAlbino • 2y ago

United States of America

I live in a college town and most of the businesses are closed on Monday, some Tuesday. Students are really only out Thur/Fri/Sat and by law last call is at 100am. Few go home on weekends; many of our students live hours away by plane so there is a lot to do on campus every weekend.

[deleted] • 2y ago

I think this varies significantly depending on your college and friend group. In my experience and where I went to school, everyone went out Thursday-Saturday nights and school that was not at all known as a party school.

Tomato_Basil57 • 2y ago

Chicago, IL

stuff does happen yeah. it wont take alot of searching to find all the us university roommate horror stories. im in school now, and haven't experienced issues personally, but knew people who had issues. i think its yet to be mentioned, but almost all residence halls have a residence assistant, someone who is there to help resolve conflicts when they do arise. and when they cant, you can typically switch roommates as a last resort

MittlerPfalz • 2y ago

I lived four in a room once - you can do it! It can be a good learning experience.

LaFleurRouler • 2y ago

Rhody 🇺🇸 & NOLA 🇺🇸

Dude, same. I stayed home until I saved up for an apartment my 3rd/junior year. The university I went to had HORRIBLE dorms. The walls were legit cement bricks and teeny tiny. They had 3 per room and it was a disaster. Plus, the floor bathrooms?!?! At least 50 people used them.

Aggressive_Tart_3137 OP • 2y ago

50...? Is it like a public bathroom situation with a bunch of toilets (and I guess showers as well) because in shared bathroom accommodation here tops you're sharing with is like 6. But it's the one bathroom.

LaFleurRouler • 2y ago

Rhody 🇺🇸 & NOLA 🇺🇸

Yes, a bunch of toilet and shower stalls (and I'm assuming urinals in the boys bathroom). The dorms were co-ed, but they had separate bathrooms for men and women. They were big, but still, sooo many people on one floor.

SnowblindAlbino • 2y ago

United States of America

The dorms I lived in for two years had one large shared bathroom per floor, so those were serving 20-35 rooms and 2x that many residents. They were also co-ed, so while there were individual stalls and showers the bathroom was shared by men and women. My eldest had exactly the same setup 25 years later...because we aren't building new dorms that often.

However, my youngest lived in a brand new dorm their first year of college (recently) and they had a bunch of private, single-user bathrooms along the hall that each had a

+ Createsammysbud • 2y ago

My sister went to a school with a housing shortage in a top 5 HCOL city. Her required dorm set up freshman year was a typical, small, 2-person room, but they removed the 2 desks and added a third bed.

As you could imagine living that cramped, they did not get along at all 😂 I'm surprised it wasn't a fire hazard, because they weren't the only ones on their floor set up like that. This was only like 10 years ago too.

Might be helpful to look at the university's housing website and see what they offer. My college only had one dorm that had communal baths and the rest were renovated to be 4:2 suites.

[deleted] • 2y ago

Like a gulag with an overpriced cafeteria